The house band for the hippy diaspora deliver another gem.

For 17 years and eight albums, country-rock quartet I See Hawks In LA have expressed ecological concerns, irreverent wit and oft-psychedelic perspective in unequalled and distinctly American music. Lead singer Rob Waller's powerful, unpolished baritone is backed by soaring harmonies from the others – as if to say to each other (and the listener) "We're here for ya." Perfectly tasty lead guitarist Paul Lacques and Waller wrote most of the songs – literate, eccentric, sort of a rural Steely Dan – while drummer Victoria Jacobs talks/co-wrote the delightfully black-humoured My Parka Saved Me. Loss of personal and collective natures is a recurring theme on this striking new collection. In Ballad For The Trees, they question "Facts that come too easily/Friends we never see" – indicating losses from technology, the kind many so-called civilised people might understand.

I SEE HAWKS IN LA Live And Never Learn

SELF-RELEASED

Cosmic Californians lay it all out in comeback bid

After receding from view for years, with members suffering family deaths and more, I See Hawks have now doubled down. Utilising roots, rock and psych styles and transcendent steel guitar to channel life's agonies, Live And Never Learn zigzags from tears to grins to epiphanies. It finds them funnelling bluesy ZZ Top ("King Of The Rosemead Boogie") and revisiting with frivolity a life-threatening car crash ("My Parka Saved Me"). The deeper the dive, the stronger the imprint: "Tearing Me In Two", "Poour Me" and "Stop Me" all intricately pit mortality against existence, and are simply haunting. And "Stop Me" would sound fantastic as a Glen Campbell cover. LUKE TORN

(WESTERN SEEDS) www.iseehawks.com

Sometimes reviewing seems like a thankless, pointless use of time. No one has anything new to bring to the table; they work the same riffs and progressions until they're as tired as a junior doctor. Then you get a record by a band like I See Hawks In L.A. that can hustle a handful of freshness out of the clichés and truisms that drag lesser bands down.

By concentrating on the small things they manage to inject more humanity into four minutes than most bands manage over the course of a career. On the face of it this is a straightforward country-rock record with songs like 'Last Man In Tojunga' demonstrating a straight-up rock'n'roller's gutsy grasp on a tune, balancing the more laid-back ease of something like 'Ballad For The Trees'.

Even the most lightweight of these songs carries an honesty that turns them into something transcendent. 'My Parka Saved Me' is a case in point, a Shangri-La's-style tune that turns on a pin, from cod melodrama to a paeon to parental love, then back. These guys know how to have serious fun and Live And Never Learn is balm for the soul.

L.A. RECORD

I SEE HAWKS IN L.A. Live and Never Learn Western Seeds

I See Hawks in L.A. have a version of Americana that I think is pretty unique to Southern California. (See in particular Dave Alvin.) It's definitely not straight forward country, nor is it straightforward folk, although some of this is like a much less cynical Loudon Wainwright. Instead, it's the musical version of the coyotes and corvids and cacti that persist in the city—I mean, just look at the band name. I See Hawks are a persistent species themselves, a nominally country-rock band with a highly developed literary capability they like to temper with an affable just-conversation kinda feel. Think writers like Charles Portis, who wrote like he was telling you a story at the bar, and think of Guy Clark and Terry Allen but also Waylon Jennings and Merle Haggard, too. I See Hawks knows there's poetry in all of them, but they still write and play like they're telling you a story at the bar, too. This album is so damn soothing and warm—something I could put on the patio stereo while I drink some beers with my dad—and they specifically reference by name so many aspects of life across greater L.A. county, from street names to native species to backyard weed smoking that it makes you feel like you're catching up with longtime friends. (I really dug the songs with where Victoria Jacobs takes the vocals—mixed it up a bit from Hawks' usual sound.) Really, I'm just happy these folks have been making music as long as they have—they've kept their humor and their humanity all this time, and I'm always glad to hear from them again.

I See Hawks in L.A. delivers more timeless twang

Within the first two verses of this longtime twang band's fifth studio album, singer-guitarist Rob Waller has asked some big questions about contemporary America, and has done so through a genre — guitar-driven country rock — that hasn't changed much since the Nixon presidency.

After noting in opening song "Ballad for the Trees" that that "every age is without precedent," Waller wonders whether "we've broken with how to be alone," and asks, "Are we drowning in the sea/ Of facts that come too easily/ And friends we never see?"

Perhaps, but if so, Waller and band don't dwell on it. Across the 14 songs on "Live and Never Learn," I See Hawks in L.A. touch on less heady themes such as smoking weed in a basement while watching the Eddie Murphy movie "Trading Places" on a black-and-white TV; smoking weed after a breakup with someone who then becomes a born-again Christian; taking speed and listening to country music; and a titular "King of the Rosemead Boogie," who "hocked himself a loogie" that he "spit in the air just like he didn't care" — and then consumed a cocktail of "two Jacks and one toke, some shatter and some coke" and "a capacity of dope."

Trouble? Waller, co-founding electric guitarist Paul Lacques and the rhythm section of Paul Marshall (bass) and Victoria Jacobs (drums) seem to know its contours. Even when Waller tries to convey sunshine, it comes at a price. The final song, "Stop Me," finds his narrator staring at the sun because it's so beautiful, unable to look away and begging for help.

He runs a parallel idea on songwriting in the next verse. "Stop me, I've been singing on this street for too long/ Trying to find my way to a beautiful song." As if he's helpless, the artist seems to rail against a muse that produces regardless of outcome — "staring into the sun/ This used to be fun/ I'm starting to believe/ there's no prize to be won."

Folk Words

http://www.folkwords.com/folkwordsreviews\_105605.html

The alternative folk/ country Americana world would be a darker place without I See Hawks In L.A. – it's unlikely that anyone else could deliver their tight harmony vocals, skilled musicianship, inspired melodies and richly hooked, eminently memorable songs – and their latest outing 'Live And Never learn' is the band on top form on all counts. The raw honesty remains, as do the songs that effortlessly touch those heart and soul parts of their listeners that consistently bring them closer to the depths of the messages.

The human problems that life throws up and that everyone faces from time to time weave their way through the lyrics, from the title track 'Live And Never Learn' through 'White Cross' to 'Stoned With Melissa' and 'The Last Man in Tujunga' there's a visceral edge that quite simply pulls you into their songs. It's inevitable that 'favorites' get a mention in any review – for me 'Ballad For The Trees' is up there, as is 'Planet Earth' and 'The Isolation Mountains'.

BY ANDY THORLEY - JUNE 19, 2018

They have been famed, over the 17 years that they've been releasing albums – their debut came out on September 11th, 2001 – for their lamentations on the natural world. So it perhaps doesn't come as much of a shock that Southern California's I See Hawks In LA usher in their first album in five years with "Ballad For The Trees". But for all the talk of "the acacias, the honeybees" and whichever species of tree they mention elsewhere, this is a song for the people of the world.

Perhaps because they have been through so much in the last few years since their last album – 2013's "Mystery Drug" (a couple of the band have lost their parents) this is a more personal record than before. Viewed through this prism, everything else makes sense. "Good intentions, are well and good," sings Rob Waller on the title track, "but they won't get you out of the neighbourhood" and it's almost as if those traumatic experiences have led them to reflect on their existence – I can certainly recall that when I lost my mum, everything else but that seemed to need thinking about.

Waller and Paul Lacques harmonise wonderfully on the absolute knockout "White Cross" (written with Good Intentions' Peter Davies), with the deep, rich tones coming straight out of Muscle Shoals, while their apparent desire to play with the formula sees "Stoned With Melissa" – and I See Hawks have always liked an anthem to weed – switch from rock n roll to something more psychedelic, but the twist it takes at the end is most unexpected (and to be fair, I am always going to love a record that has the phrase "sitting in Melissa's basement with a black and white TV, watching Trading Places, she hates Eddie Murphy" at its heart).

"Poour Me" (sic) is a classic country strum, and an ode to getting roaring drunk – at least ostensibly, but then you need to remember that these boys and lady are a little too subtle for that. There is more of that feel on "Planet Earth", which is elevated above the norm by some absolutely stunning Lap Steel playing.

Perhaps the best example of their ability to look at things in a way that no one else would is "The Last Man In Tujunga", it has all the devil may care ebullience of Chuck Berry, but it concerns the fires that saw bass player Paul Marshall almost lose his home (and it has a little Stones homage too). This left-field thinking, though, is natural, not forced, and when they are looking at graves at the start of "Singing In The Wind" it all makes perfect sense.

Drummer Victoria Jacobs narrates her own story on "My Parka Saved Me" and it almost has an air of "The Leader Of The Pack" as she does, while members of Old Californio appear on "King Of The Rosemead Boogie" which rocks and pulses along with a rare urgency.

“Tearing Me In Two” with its Celtic touches is another highlight, as are Jacobs’ vocals on the 60s, West Coast infused “Spinning” that follows in the spirit of The Byrds and their ilk and seems to be floating along. And the fiddle work of Dave Markowitz is quite brilliant on the equally blissful – but in an entirely different way – “The Isolation Mountains”.

“Stop Me” ends the record on a warm, airy note. Its widescreen sounds seem to suggest that anything is possible, and such is the ambition on this album that you couldn’t disagree with the premise.

“Live And Never Learn” is one of those wonderful records that reveals itself in different ways with each passing listen. I could review it tomorrow and hear different things – that’s just how it is made. It is these textures, though, these different strands, that make it so special. Rating 8.5/10

September 11, 2001 ... a day that none of us will soon forget. It was also the day when I See Hawks in L.A. released their untitled debut on the world and immediately conquered the hearts of everyone who liked roots music. The fact that Dave Alvin took part in it was an argument to open many doors, just like the presence of fiddler Brantley Kearns: a band that gets that ready at its debut.

Over the years the group expanded and today you have as base: Rob Waller (guitar and lead vocals), Paul Lacques (guitar, lap steel and vocals), Paul Marshall (bass and vocals) and Victoria Jacobs (drums, guitar and vocals), which is complemented by Richie Lawrence (accordion and piano), Dave Markowitz (fiddle), Danny McGough (keys) and Dave Zirbel (pedal steel guitar). Four vocalists and three songwriters in the band is a great luxury, and that shows once again on this first new CD in over five years: most of the songs come from the pens of Waller / Lacques, but drummer Victoria Jacobs also contributes with her "Spinning", a wonderful piece of psychedelic folk, and the story behind her "My Parka Saved Me": she narrates the story and the other band members make it a great country rock song, layered with the most fantastic doo-wop background vocals and a Hammond feast for the ears. Look next month especially to the specialized charts: they will score very high in it, for sure!

'Live and Never Learn,' the first album in five years from I See Hawks in L.A., certainly has that early Eagles country rock feel running through the core of its 14 tracks. The title track offers up a microcosm of what is to come, rhythmic, mid-paced tempo, reverby Telecaster and easy on the ear. The quality of musicianship is spot on throughout the album and much credit for that must go to five-times Grammy-winning mixer Alfonso Rodenas.

Most songs have been written by the combination of band members Paul Lacques, who also produced, and Rob Waller, with many of the songs a direct reflection of the personal angst that the band have lived through over the last few years. Using trouble and strife as inspiration for songwriting is a staple of course but The Hawks have the knack of using subtle humour to mitigate some difficult subject matters. For an example look no further than the unique and distinctive 'My Parka Saved Me' which features drummer Victoria Jacobs narrating the true story of a car crash she suffered as a teenager when it was only the thickness of her coat that saved her from the glass.

'The Last Man in Tujunga' tells the tale of a breakup unfolding over a mobile phone call as the flames of a Californian wildfire inch ever closer. There is more than a touch of Mike Nesmith in the vocals here and, again, the subject matter is made even more poignant by band member Paul Marshall's own recent experience of having to evacuate his Tujunga home during the fires of 2017.

On an album full of great sounding tracks it is two songs that were co-written with Peter Davies of the UK's Good Intentions that really stand out and showcase that Eagles sound at its best. 'White Cross' and 'Singing in The Wind' have the Hawks' trademark intelligent and clever lyrics, great melodies and harmonies. That said, it would be unfair to label the Hawks as a simple Eagles soundalike band. There are boogies, 'King of The Rosemead Boogie,' the traditional sounding country of 'Poor Me' and 'The Isolation Mountains,' as well as the folksy and dreamlike 'Spinning'.

I See Hawks in L.A. have succeeded in recording an album that both showcases their own distinctive musical talents whilst, whether by design or accident, tapping into some of the heart and soul of 70's California. And that is no bad thing.

A Rare Treat for the Ears and the Soul

Live and Never Learn, the eighth album from these California Country rock ‘n’ rollers is a wonderful treat for both the ears and the soul. I’ve previously heard comparisons to that other west coast band, the Eagles, but I don’t hear it here. The Hawks are fearless where the Eagles take it easy, and their harmonies take more from doo-wop and bar-room country than, say CSN&Y. The Hawks could easily accomplish musically the Eagles sound, but they’re smarter than that, they take more chances, their sense of humor is near boundless. A case in point: The Eagles would never, could never, create such songs as “Ballad for the Trees,” “The Last Man in Tujunga,” or especially the wonderful, hilarious, and all-important “My Parka Saved Me,” which I’m going to go ahead and say is most likely the best song of 2018 so far. Seriously. We’ll come back to that in a moment, first, the rest of the album.

Novelty songs have long been a rock ‘n’ roll tradition. Remember “Flying Saucer Rock and Roll,” “Splish Splash,” or “Purple People Eater”? Yeah, novelty crap humor; but they rocked. This is important. “Wooly Bully” rocked. “I Put a Spell on You” rocked. But that doesn’t mean it’s an easy thing to accomplish. One wrong turn at Albuquerque and suddenly you’re in “Itsy Bitsy Teenie Weenie Yellow Polka-Dot Bikini” or “The Chipmunk Song” territory. Humor in rock ‘n’ roll is important and vital. Otherwise everything is Pink Floyd and the National—fine bands yet not what you go after when you want a rollicking and fun trip. And humor is something the Hawks seem to have no short supply of, from the way Robert Waller’s vocal on “Last Man in Tujunga” rapidly descends on the word “collapsing,” stretching it out further than any fully sane singer would ever attempt—but it works, the song needs it to be effective—to the utter lack of any sense of irony on many of these songs. They play it straight, knowing full well how to milk the laughs with a poker face. Smart, humorous lyrics and quick asides from the band such as they way the charge into a single bar of the Stones’ “Satisfaction” right in the middle of “Tujunga” and then continue on as if nothing happened, or the way the pedal steel supports the vocal in “Poour Me,” adding more layers to this wonderful tale of woe.

On several of these songs the Hawks, with Rob Waller’s river bottom vocals and the band’s inherent quirkiness, are reminiscent of the Handsome Family, yet the Handsome Family never rocked this hard, especially on “Stoned with Melissa” which is a fast-paced rocker that starts out making you laugh but takes a sudden turn down a dark alley. Life’s not all fun and games and the Hawks know this, even if it gives them pause to wonder why at times. “Spinning” is dreamy Alt-psychedelia, while “King of the Rosemead Boogie” is a barn spinner of an uptempo blues, and the title song, “Live and Never Learn,” is smooth, smooth Country. The Hawks are all over the map, yet fully in sync, the songs never sounding forced or contrived.

And now we get to “My Parka Saved Me.” Every great album needs a song worthy of putting on repeat and this is the one. We start off with the band opening the door for the organ swells which bring us right in to a rather funny and also rather harrowing true story narrated by the band's drummer, Victoria Jacobs, in a voice sublimely caught somewhere between the Mid-West and Valley Girl: She got high. She broke up with her boyfriend. She went for a drive down to the lake. The lake was frozen and there was lots of snow. Suddenly, a drunk driver hits her and she "spun like a donut! There was glass everywhere!" All this backed perfectly by the band in a sawdust floor bar-room band manner while a countrified doo-wop section plays the part of Greek chorus, repeating her story line by line in a perfect straight-man sort of way. No time for irony here, just the facts, ma'am. Jacobs' story continues as she parries back and forth with the band as they break out and begin to embellish on her tale. "That's not true!" she regales them, but they continue on unabated, facts and memories now distorting into one another as the song and continues on with a catchy refrain and a wonderful keyboard backdrop, which works very much like Al Kooper's organ on Dylan's "Like a Rolling Stone," in that it percolates and bubbles throughout, creating even more interest, drawing the listener in.

This is an amazing song and indeed, album. All the disparate parts fit together wonderfully, telling a story that is tragic, comical, and all too true, in a way only a band as brilliant and as fearless as I See Hawks in L.A. can.

<https://www.paris-move.com/reviews/live-and-never-learn/>

Alternative country, Americana ... These generic terms now cover a galaxy of formations and artists as diverse as varied. From Uncle Tupelo and Giant Sand to Jayhawks and Calexico, their only real common denominator remains the thematic distance maintained with the original idiom, but also the formal permanence of its musical heritage. Originally (as their name implies) from Los Angeles, I SEE HAWKS IN L.A. employ pedal-steel, fiddle and dobro, as well as guitar picking borrowed from bluegrass and country rhythms. But DNA from local predecessors such as the Byrds and other Flying Burrito Brothers, as well as ecological concerns close to those of their ancient neighbors of the Grateful Dead circa "American Beauty" ("Ballad For The Trees") are easily identified in their genealogy ("Live And Never Learn", "Planet Earth"). They also count in their ranks a true veteran of psychedelia in the person of the bassist Paul Marshall (ex-Strawberry Alarm Clock, where he partnered with Ed King, future Lynyrd Skynyrd). Should we see the cause of lysergic incursions such as "Stoned With Melissa" or "My Parka Saved Me"?

The general climate of "Live And Never Learn", their eighth album, lies between Gram Parsons' country-rock and Townes Van Zandt ("Last Man In Tujunga", "Tearing Me In Two"), and the neo-country of Gourds ("Pour Me") and Asleep At The Wheel ("King Of The Rosemead Boogie"). While Rob Waller is responsible for most of the lead vocals, his three accomplices turn out to be accomplished choristers (including the new drummer, Victoria Jacobs, who is also capable of singing vocals). In short, legitimate perpetuators, who do not hesitate to loosen the shackles of a genre long threatened with sclerosis.

(Belgium) 'I See Hawks In L.A.' is one of the most underrated bands in California. Their music is and remains always fascinating and honest and so we are glad that we can now listen to their latest album 'Live and Never Learn'. Their previous 'Mistery Drug' is already 5 years old. On this new album we find 14 originals and they include guest musicians like Richie Lawrence on accordion and piano, Dave Markowitz on fiddle, Danny McGough on organ and synthesizer and Dave Zirbel on pedal steel.

Most songs were written by Paul Lacques, who also produced, and Rob Waller. The daily problems in the lives of the various band members were an inspiration for writing new material. Numbers where the quality always takes the upper hand. Songs in which the humor of I See Hawks in L.A. disguises the reality such as 'My Parka Saved Me' in which drummer Victoria Jacobs tells the true story of a car accident that she suffered as a teenager.

'The Last Man in Tujunga' is again the story when band member Paul Marshall had to evacuate his home during the Californian wildfire in 2017. 'White Cross' and 'Singing in The Wind' are songs that show the personification of these 'Hawks'. Songs with high harmonies, a bit like the Eagles did at the time that does not mean that you have this 'I See Hawks In L.A.' to identify with it.

'King Of The Rosemead Boogie' is the pepper and salt on this beautiful album, where they clearly choose the country-folk side with songs like 'Poour Me' and 'The Isolation Mountains'. They end with the Americana flavored 'Stop Me', something they do not have to do about me.

LONESTAR★TIME SUPPORT TEXAS MUSIC

<http://www.lonestartime.com/2018/05/i-see-hawks-in-la-live-and-never-learn.html>

(Italy) The Roots scene in Los Angeles for almost sixty years has been one of the most vibrant cornerstones in America. In the warm Californian sun, generations of musicians have matured and they have been able to unite with great skill country, folk and bluegrass with rock, opening often unusual ways and experimenting with brilliance those sounds. I See Hawks In L.A., since 1999, have been among the best flag-bearers of the bonds between rock and country music, with eight discs that refer to the golden years (1960s and 70s) of West Coast music. Personally, their approach often reminds me of the first New Riders Of The Purple Sage release, those who, under the aegis of Jerry Garcia, a great fan of country and bluegrass, added their personal touch of rock and soul (from Bo Diddley to Johnny Otis) and a pinch of psychedelia to flavor everything.

Rob Waller and Paul Lacques have helmed the band from its beginnings and over the years have kept high the bar, never failing to compose excellent country songs forming a repertoire very pleasant and very consistent. The guitarists are joined by bassist Paul Marshall and drummer Victoria Jacobs in a compact and cohesive quartet augmented by the talented Richie Lawrence on keyboards, Dave Zirbel who with his pedal steel retraces the style of the great Buddy Cage (from the New Riders) and Dave Markowitz on the fiddle. "Live And Never Learn" is a record full of excellent country songs like the song that gives the title to the album. "Poour Me", "The Last Man In Tujunga" and "White Cross" in particular stand out, with the great love for the environment of "Ballad For The Trees" and "Planet Earth", rock and psychedelic that follow one another in the funny "Stoned With Melissa", the delicate and poetic "The Isolation Mountains" and the nostalgic "Stop Me", gems of a collection that confirms I See Hawks In LA are among the most valid independent roots bands. And what a name!

Words About Music
From
Greg Burk & Friends

I See Hawks in L.A., "Live and Never Learn." Even music lovers who've never been drunk & divorced will appreciate this country apotheosis, as creative as it is polished. Singer Rob Waller may tell a torn tale, but his beatific resignation and the inspired guitar of Paul Lacques make us feel we'll persevere, crying and laughing at the same time.

<http://www.countrystandardtime.com/d/cdreview.asp?xid=6706>

This is the storied, rather unheralded band I See Hawks in LA's first release since 2013's "Mystery Drug." "Live and Never Learn" continues the legacy of a band that's been together for almost two decades now. They channel Gram Parsons, New Riders of the Purple Sage and the Byrds/Burritos into their singular brand of psychedelic country rock with the superb lead vocals of Rob Waller, capable players in the core lineup as well as guests. Among the guests are: Dave Zirbel (Commander Cody) on pedal steel, Dave Markowitz on fiddle and Richie Lawrence on accordion and piano. Together, they flush out a laid-back hippy vibe, the hallmark of ISHILA's sound.

Emerging from a string of family deaths, California wild fires and various struggles, the band found some solace in finally being able to record again. The songwriting team of Rob Waller and Paul Lacques receives contributions from bassist Paul Marshall and drummer Victoria Jacobs on this outing. Members of Old Californio deliver "King of the Rosemead Boogie" and via email from Peter Davies of the U.K.'s Good Intentions we have "White Cross" and "Singing in the Wind." The latter takes us to the shores of Northern Ireland. Jacobs sings on her psychedelic folk oriented "Spinning" and recounts a tragic tale from the winter on Lake Michigan in "My Parka Saved Me."

"Last Man in Tujunga" is native territory as the story unfolds about a breakup conversation over a cell phone as the flames from a fire draw nearer. Although the song was written years ago, it is frighteningly timely as Marshall was forced to evacuate his home in the recent fires twice - lyrically stated as "almost out of minutes" as the "flames were licking at the gates."

The band has long been noted for its sense of humor which we hear on the self-pitying "Poour Me," their requisite ode to weed in "Stoned with Melissa" and their interest in conservation with "Planet Earth" and "Ballad for the Trees." Markowitz's fiddle and Lawrence's accordion drive both "Isolation Mountains" and "Tearing Me in Two," both outstanding tracks.

I See Hawks in LA are consistent with terrific story songs and solid musicianship. After the hiatus, they sound as good as ever, maybe even a little better.

"A reeling but seamless blend of fantasy and reality"

You know that moment of slight trepidation before biting into an apple? Sure, it looks good, and you really like apples, but will the first bite reveal this one to be nice and crisp or a mushy mess?

Magnify that frisson of suspense 100 times. That's me about to listen to a new album by a band I like.

In an odd way, it's harder for me to really enjoy a new release from a favorite band, especially on first listen, than to get into records from acts new to me. While I wouldn't want anybody to duplicate previous efforts, it usually takes me a while to cotton to new material.

Of course, I have to like how the music sounds. But what I'm really after is feel. Where does the music take me, what moods and memories does it evoke, who do I get to be while I'm listening and – trickiest of all – does the new music work a similar kind of alchemy as previous releases? It's a tall order.

I welcomed the news this spring that the country rock quartet I See Hawks In L.A. was gearing up to release their eighth album on June 29. But I have to admit to that old shiver of suspense before playing "Live and Never Learn" the first time.

I all but imprinted on the Hawks' 2004 release "Grapevine" and have a soft spot in my heart for 2008's "Hallowed Ground." I don't have enough fingers and toes to count the times I've seen them play. My phone is so full it thinks twice before saving anything on the calendar app, but I still can't quite bring myself to remove several must-have Hawks songs from the phone's music player. Hey, it's just prudent to keep "Humboldt" handy. So, yeah, I like this band.

There's exuberance in their music, regret, hard-won wisdom, humor and wit. I can blast "Wonder Valley Fight Song" and feel like a badass for four minutes and 53 seconds, or call up "The River Knows" to float on the sense that current difficulties will become less pressing. There's connection to community and location.

There's an imagined place their music lets me visit. It's Mojave-esque but the details are hazy and variable. Sometimes there's a road; sometimes the lyrics suggest a trail. The drums may sketch a distant train. There are mountains and playas, rocky escarpments, a lot of sky and few people. I feel good there and unconsciously hope for another trip, another view, with each new Hawks release. Some give glimpses; some offer vistas.

It isn't that the Hawks' songs are all about the desert, but this is the landscape the music most frequently conjures in my mind. The second-place finisher is a fictionalized version of Los Angeles that, frankly, is probably closer to reality than the monolithic sprawl of my Northern Californian perception. To borrow a lyric, where they lead, I will follow. And I'm most satisfied with Hawks releases that give a sense of where we're going.

I cue up the preview copy of "Live and Never Learn," index finger hovering over the play button. Will this one be a ticket to my nebulous desert sanctuary? Is this apple a keeper?

I hit play. Oh, yeah. This record and I were good friends after just a listen or two. We're practically making plans to go camping together next weekend. I know just where we'll go. The music suggested it. This one's a keeper right to the core.

With spirited three-part vocals, evocative lyrics and arrangements that soar, groove and occasionally growl, I See Hawks In L.A.'s sound springs from the intersection of rock, country, psychedelia and folk. They have a big stylistic range and yet always sound like themselves.

There's Hawksian variety on "Live and Never Learn," but the album hangs together as a coherent whole, perhaps more than any of their previous releases.

I asked the band what defined their music. Lead singer Rob Waller said he had "no idea. I have a vague idea of the limits of the property," he said, "but I've never had the stamina to hike all the way out there to try and find the fence."

Lead guitarist Paul Lacques volunteered, "At our best, we're a cool party for misfits." Fair enough.

In more mundane terms, I'd say the vocals are at the core of the quintessential Hawks' sound. There's soul in Waller's delivery, a sense there's a human being expressing something, not just a singer trying to hit the notes and articulate the words. His voice often has an undercurrent of wistful yearning, giving additional heart to the songs.

Lacques and bassist Paul Marshall, both baritones, fit their harmonies around Waller's lead, trading off who sings high and who sings low. Their voices blend so well it's difficult to unbraid the harmonies.

And there's a new featured voice on "Live and Never Learn." Drummer, singer and songwriter Victoria Jacobs, the newest Hawk, contributed harmony vocals to three earlier songs, and steps to the front twice on this album. Perhaps because she's introduced alternating with Waller on "My Parka Saved Me," adding this new voice to the palette works.

The Hawks' instrumentation supports the vocals. Lacques' lead electric, acoustic and steel guitar lines are as explosive or delicate as needed, with Waller's rhythm acoustic as counterpoint. Marshall's bass lines embroider the songs, providing understated complexity. Jacobs can rock propulsively or play with a smooth country cadence.

"'Mystery Drug' [the Hawks' previous release] featured Victoria drumming on four tracks," said Lacques, "kind of a transition, but 'Live and Never Learn' is the first album she's on every cut, and she's songwriter or co-songwriter on three songs. Her style is a major influence on the sound. She's a very subtle, groove-oriented drummer, religiously avoids flashy fills."

Jacobs said that she came from a rock background, "and now I'm playing shuffles and train beats," describing the change as both fun and a challenge. "When I first joined I would try and copy what was being played," she said. "Now I feel comfortable with adding my own feel or style to songs."

While the Hawks have been busy touring and working on other projects, "Live and Never Learn" is the band's first release since 2013.

"Somehow five years had gone by in a flash and we were ready," said Waller. "I also particularly wanted to capture the sound of the Hawks with Victoria behind the drums. We've definitely evolved over these last few years and had something new to say both musically and lyrically."

"The spirit moved us last year," said Lacques, "and we came up with quite a few songs. And we worked up a couple of oldies and finally got good versions."

It's been a rough few years personally for the Hawks. "I lost my mom in 2015 and Paul L. lost both his parents in the last year and a half," said Waller. "I think those kinds of primary losses really cause a major shift in perspective," he reflected. "A generational shift."

According to Lacques, the material on the new album "isn't so much about specific losses or crises, but is certainly informed by it. Many of the songs are about acceptance, or dualism – life throws you impossible choices, and you choose."

Of the new songs, "'Planet Earth' is the most directly about loss," said Waller, "about leaving the planet and thinking back nostalgically about how great and easy life was, reflecting on the good parts."

But that's not to say the record comes across as a collection of mid-tempo musings on mortality. Far from it. There are waltzes, ballads, shuffles, rave-ups and romps about topics as varied as card sharks, trees and mountains, and getting dumped via cell phone during a wildfire.

That song about one hell of a bad day is "Last Man in Tujunga," which is premiered here. Marshall says, "like a lot of Hawks songs, it's a reeling but seamless blend of fantasy and reality."

And how exactly did Waller and Lacques hit upon this combination of topics as the premise for a song? “Rob might remember,” said Lacques, “but the song seems like it was one of those spontaneous combustions that often happen when we’re jamming.”

While Waller and Lacques wrote the song in 2004 or 2005, the Hawks hadn’t been able to get a satisfactory recording of it. Fast-forward to 2017, when wildfires forced Marshall to evacuate his Tujunga home twice.

“The fires were certainly an inspiration and a reminder,” said Waller. “We first did it again at a gig last fall, and it sounded so good with Victoria I really wanted to record it. It felt really good to resurrect it.”

“Playing this song now is like experiencing a musical collage of the song’s long existence,” said Marshall, “and my most recent adventure of last summer, saying to myself, ‘Well, I guess I gotta go now,’ as the 30 foot high flames approached within a couple of blocks of my home.”

“It’s kind of funny with the dated phone plan lyrics,” said Waller. “No one has to worry about ‘burning’ through minutes anymore! But that’s all more charming to me and fits with the theme of living and never learning quite well.”

While Waller and Lacques are the band’s principal songwriters, they don’t eschew collaboration.

“Rob and I have always worked with other writers, notably my brother Anthony,” said Lacques, “and Paul Marshall and Victoria have had songwriting [credits] or co-writes on a number of albums. A big new addition on “Live And Never Learn” is Peter Davies, from UK folk band The Good Intentions. We’ve co-written an entire album’s worth of songs with Peter, which we’ll release as a Hawks/Intentions collaboration CD later this year or early 2019. We liked two of the songs so much that we stole them for this record.” Members of Old Californio co-wrote one song.

The Hawks are hitting the road for a string of album release shows in the US and UK, including one tonight at The Palms Playhouse in Winters, Calif. Singer, songwriter and guitarist Rick Shea will open that show and join the Hawks. Lacques says Shea is “one of the fifth Hawks, and we get him up on stage whenever we can.”

I See Hawks in LA is the somewhat unusual name of a Californian country rock band that makes typical Westcoast pop, with the Eagles, Crosby Stills Nash & Young and similar bands, but then you have to let go of that idea right away, because the Hawks, as we call them here for the sake of convenience, just like those bands sing beautifully in harmony and write nice songs, but then the comparison ends.

The Hawks are just a bit more adventurous and above all more humorous than all those other Westcoast bands. Intelligent and above all very funny texts are sublime, with many small jokes hidden in the arrangements. In the middle of the song "Last Man In Tujunga," suddenly a piece of Satisfaction from the Stones comes along, after which they continue as if nothing happened. And as the pedal steel guitar in Poor Me manages to get the matter wholly over the top, that is nothing short of hilarious.

A good example of the adventurous and at the same time humorous approach of the Hawks is the song "My Parka Saved Me," in which Victoria Jacobs, the drummer of the band, talks about a car accident she had in the past - she dryly narrates the tale while the men of the band repeat and comment as a kind of Greek chorus. At a certain moment the men take off with the story and she calls "That is not true", but the men sing their version of history dry and unperturbed. I have not heard a funnier song in ages, and that is largely due to the way it is brought.

The irresistible country rock 'n' roll of the Hawks has many more sides, because they can also rock hard, with beautiful guitar riffs, suffused with blues, and sometimes some psychedelics, and it's always good.

While it has been a mere 17 years since their first release, Hawks have been one of my private pleasures during those years. While I have tried to expose as many folks as possible to them, it seems we remain a cult. A cult that hearkens you back to that wonderful acoustic amalgam that was the 1970s. In terms of themes and style, they embody the West Coast version of that decade. With McGuinn and Hillman about to venture forth on their Sweetheart tour, this'll get you in the mood.

What other band could do a memorable song about a borrowed snow parka? "My Parka Saved Me," begins with Rob Waller and drummer Victoria Jacobs trading vocals — "I got stoned after breaking up with my boyfriend/And he became a born-again Christian" — before going into the car crash that follows. It's not played for chuckles, but rather as emblematic of those random events of that decade that were on first glance just an ordinary occurrence, but upon reflection, something ethereal. Like this band, and especially this record. -- Amos Perrine

For the past 20 years or so, I See Hawks in LA have purveyed an essential country-rock crossover formula brewed as authentic Americana, so authentic in fact that it might give those boys from Bakersfield a run for their money. Adding a prerequisite touch of twang, soaring melodies and a rugged and rowdy pastiche, the current incarnation of this West Coast-based band consists of vocalist/guitarists Paul Lacques and Rob Waller, bassist/vocalist Paul Marshall, and drummer/vocalist/sometime guitarist Victoria Jacobs, with various guests sitting in. Theirs is a sound that summons the wide open spaces of America's sprawling western expanse, from the forlorn barroom moan of "Pour Me," to the swampy set-up of "White Cross" and the upbeat exchange delineated in "Stoned with Melissa," along with all sorts of realms that collide in-between.

In many ways, I See Hawks in LA offer a throwback to an earlier era, one which found rock and country finding common ground in the songs of the Byrds, the Burritos, the Dead, and the New Riders of the Purple Sage. Their forthright vocals and sweep of pedal steel guitar boast a high lonesome sound, one that echoes with the original optimism of days gone by. "Every year is without precedent, every hour is a great unknown," opening track "Ballad for the Trees" proclaims, its steady pace providing a way forward. Indeed, these Hawks fly high on an adroit blend of optimism and insistence, a sound that culminates in the rocking refrains of "The Last Man in Tujunga," a ready rocker that's full of sentiment and sincerity, and "My Parka Saved Me" a nuanced narrative that relates a harrowing tale of a near-fatal mishap.

Suffice it to say, Live and Never Learn ought to be essential listening for any admirer of authentic Americana. Its title aside, this is one band that's lived and learned their lessons well, while eagerly offering them to others.

City of Angels, Fallen and Otherwise

by Ron Jacobs

Bakersfield, California has Buck Owens, Luckenbach, Texas has Willie and the boys, Los Angeles has I See Hawks In LA. This latter band continues its original take on a sound that originates in the canyons, parched yards and beaches of Los Angeles. Reminiscent of Buffalo Springfield, the Flying Burrito Brothers and New Riders of the Purple Sage, their California sensibilities, incredible guitar playing, pleasing harmonies and sublime pedal steel come together once again on their new album Live and Never Learn. Although it's hard to believe they have been putting out music for seventeen years, this fact is also a useful marker of time. If one thinks about the album title a bit out of the context of the song—which is about a love gone wrong—it's quite obvious that the world certainly has not learned its lessons over the past seventeen years.

I See Hawks in LA is one of the most musically accomplished groups in the genre now known as Americana. The intricate guitar interplay between Rob Waller and Paul Lacques continues to shine. Indeed, the playing is once again seamless and sublime. Likewise, the vocals define harmony as it can be at its most exquisite moments. Guest appearances on various tunes by Peter Davies on Telecaster, Danny McCough on B3 organ, longtime collaborators Dave Markowitz, on fiddle and accordionist Richie Lawrence sweeten this collection like a shot of top-shelf bourbon sweetens a good night at a bar. Then there's the master picking of pedal steel player Dave Zirbel. At times his pedal steel playing is pure country, other times it reminds this listener of Jerry Garcia's manipulation of country music's most interesting instrument on his first solo record. In other words, the sound is surreal, ethereal, and damn near psychedelic in and of itself.

The songs on Live and Never Learn are a classic mix of I See Hawks in LA humor, social commentary and human emotions. In terms of musical genres, they run from serious rockers to pure country, with a bit of psychedelia thrown in there too. "Pour Me" is a song about lost love and liquor that feature Zirbel's pedal steel playing. "Pour Me" evokes the sense of tragedy one finds in almost every song about failed love, whether it's the latest hit on the Top Forty or something more serious, but it also understands the reality that life goes on. No one is dying in this tune, just falling on the floor from too much libation. A Song for the Trees is a Byrds-like melody addressing a constant topic of I See Hawks in LA –the environment and its destruction in the name of progress. Spinning, written by new member and drummer Victoria Jacobs (no relation) is wistful psychedelic folk that turns the mind around and around in the most pleasant manner.

There's a song titles "White Cross" on this disc. For those who don't know what the song is referring to, white crosses are little amphetamine pills that used to be popular with truck drivers, cross country travelers and all-night diner workers. They were bootleg, cheap and effective enough to get the job done. Lowell George refers to them in the Little Feat tune “Willin” when he sings about weed, whites and wine—the other popular name for the drug was whites. Anyhow, one line in the aforementioned song “White Cross” goes like this: “The first one goes down bitter/then you begin to like the taste.” Like many of the songs on this work, that line describes how life is in this postmodern, postindustrial land epitomized perhaps best by the often desperate and lonely contradiction that is the City of the Angels.

Los Angeles is a vast city. It revels in corruption and crime; oppression and inequality poison its streets. Yet, it remains a sunlit magnet that beckons those the world over to its oil-flecked shores. Full of loneliness and love like any modern metropolis, it is up to its artists, poets and storytellers to expose its glories and its shame. I See Hawks in LA’s latest and Lombardo’s debut novel do so with wit, wonder, and a bit of wisdom.

BLABBER 'N SMOKE

<https://paulkerr.wordpress.com/2018/07/20/i-see-hawks-in-la-live-and-never-learn-western-seeds-record-company/>

Glasgow -- Still flying that old freak flag high and championing the evergreen sounds of Topanga canyon country rock from back in the seventies, I See Hawks in LA return to the fore with this excellent slice of slinky and sly songs. It’s been five years since their last album Mystery Drug and in the meantime two band members have had to contend with the passing of parents, events which stalled the band but which they say they got through due to friends, family and making music. A presumption then that these songs might have had a longer gestation than usual but they are all the better for that as The Hawks deliver a wonderfully balanced set which sets rockers and humorous tales alongside more serious matters such as their ongoing concern for the environment.

It's a lengthy album but chockfull of great songs. Forget about the comparisons to the Eagles which commonly inhabit reviews of the Hawks. Here they delve deeper into the sounds of bands such as Poco, New Riders of The Purple Sage and even the good old Grateful Dead – just listen to the winding guitars in Singing In the Wind (a song which weirdly enough finds the Hawks in wind blasted Wuthering Heights territory). There's also a soupçon of southern syncopation in the slow meander of White Cross and surely that's the spring heeled wackiness of NRBQ lurking in the taut rhythms of Stoned with Melissa before it dissolves into its incense and peppermint coda. There's cosmic cowboy joy in Pour Me while The Last Man in Tujunga is a supreme roadhouse boogie styled song which would give Commander Cody a run for his money.

The band are more contemplative on their ecology themed songs. Ballad For The Trees has singer Rob Waller sounding like Brett Sparks of The Handsome Family as he sings of the ecosystem in danger of breaking down as the band huff and puff with a powerful country rock chug. Planet Earth is, strangely enough, more ethereal, lifted to the heavens by some heavenly pedal steel playing despite the dystopian despair of the spare lyrics which recall the words of J. G. Ballard. There's also a light touch on the breezy Live and Never Learn where Dave Zirbel's pedal steel uncoils itself in best 70's country rock fashion while Tearing Me in Two adds some fiddle to the mix moving the band from the saloon to the front porch.

We need to mention two songs on which drummer Victoria Jacobs features. My Parka Saved Me is an almost fifties styled death on the road song as she recites the tale of a car smash with a twist on the old tale of a cigarette case catching a bullet. On Spinning she sings lead and takes us down a paisley patterned rabbit hole, a lovely nod to the naivety of many of the psychedelic folk songs of that long gone era. A paisley pattern or more appropriately, a coat of many colours, just about sums up this album as it dips and dives into various styles but overall the band weave these disparate threads into a very fine tapestry of songs and sounds, the end result being one of their best albums.

-- Paul Kerr

While I have listened to this band in the past I paid more attention to the lyrics on this album as they just seem to stand out from the music a little more. The concept and humour of My Parka Saved Me was an immediate attention grabber with the spoken female lyric being followed closely by that of singer Rob Waller. It is both effective as a story and as an example of the bands oeuvre. The opening song is an ode to environmentalism and Ballad For The Trees not only mentions a selection of trees but also the under threat honey bees. Known as purveyors of “psychedelic country” in California you can hear where that tag has come from but they are also an accomplished group of players who are musically adept and aware.

Guitarist and producer (and band leader) Paul Lacques knows what he wants this album to sound like and over the 14 original songs manages to create a range of musical sketches that gives the listener the space to enjoy what I See Hawks In LA have to offer. Waller has a baritone voice that has enough resonance to give each song its focus. He is ably supported vocally by the remainder of the band whose harmonies are a reminder of many a Californian band and singer of yore. This and their individual musical talents, which are enhanced by some additional musicians on keyboards, pedal steel and fiddle, all helps to make these songs shine and this is perhaps the best album that this combo has yet produced.

The songs that stand out for a number of reasons aside for the afore mentioned My Parka Saved Me where drummer Victoria Jacobs provides the female vocal are Stoned With Melissa (a simple tale of daily imbibing), Pour Me a word play on “poor me” and “pour me”, as in, another glass of wine! Aside from the intentional humour these songs often have something of the element of truth to them. They can also rock out as they do on The Last Man In Tujunga with its odd yet intriguing chorus of “I’m almost out of minuets and I’m almost out of bullets” and on the boogieified workout King Of Rosemead Boogie.

This is the eight album from I See Hawks In LA in a career heading for 20 years together and they are continuing to perfect their individual take on Californian country music. There is little here that sounds like filler and much to enjoy. Long may they live and never learn.

(German, translation) Time flies differently in the hills of Southern California. More relaxed than in the rest of the country, where Trump's "you're fired!" became the hard credo. Not so in a land where sunsets are still brought in pastel shades with oil paint on the canvas. And songs may be called Stoned with Melissa or Pour me, without the political correctness movement approaching.

I SEE HAWKS IN L.A. are Southern California, as you can only be Southern California. Growing up with Westcoast and Country, with POCO and the early EAGLES, the songs roll like a leisurely warm breeze over the ridge towards the sea. The environmental protection they have so much in the heart, that he may immediately determine the first song of the new album (Ballad For The Trees), later highlighted again in the ballad Planet Earth. And even when things get really tight, like in the real tale of Last Man in Tujunga, which describes the flight from a conflagration, the Fiddle swings as loosely as on a Haystack Festival in Tennessee ...

But it's exactly this relaxed "I've seen it all" attitude is the strength of this album and this band. There's a foursome playing together because everyone loves music and making music so much - and because they all find a groove that carries them far across the land. Singing In The Wind is a prime example of this, when the song begins as leisurely as a Glen Campbell outtake and then takes off with gorgeous harmony vocals and, carried by a lively fingerpicking, actually makes the head clear like a fresh breeze.

Incidentally, they also have a laconic black humor, as the call-and-response Moritat My Parka Saved Me proves. Of course, the story of the car accident after separating from a born-again Christian boyfriend is true - such stories are only written by life. But as I SEE HAWKS IN L.A. tell, it just takes a whole bunch of life experience.

It fits into the picture that the "Hawks" have worked with Dave Alvin over and over again. King Of The Rosemead Boogie is just as typical a rocker with a lightly pulled handbrake and nasal vocals as the former BLASTERS boss would write in the dead of night to make every sleepy club go.

But in their hearts I SEE HAWKS IN L.A. are a laid-back country band in the best sense of the word. And so pain and self-reproaches can be better with a few good friends to make it an acoustic ballad jewel Tearing Me In Two. It's simply too beautiful in Southern California ...

(Dutch translation) The facts: An American country rock band from California. A band with members, all of whom can sing and thus deliver celestial singing together. According to some, this kind of fact automatically means that you're a band like the Eagles.

In the case of the band I See Hawks In L.A. you can go further. Yes, indeed, their harmony singing sounds great and they play country rock. But the kind of country rock that tends more towards the traditional country where you have to think of for Waylon Jennings or Dwight Yoakam. On their eighth album the band sounds nostalgic like a country rock band like The New Riders Of The Purple Sage from the late 70s.

Their album opens with the barroom country of Ballad For The Trees, with sparkling guitar work. Live And Never Learn is a soft rocking Americana song with brushes drumming by drummer Victoria Jacobs. The rest of the band consists of Rob Walker (vocals, guitar), Paul Lacques (guitar, steel, vocals) and Paul Marshall (bass, vocals). Stoned With Melissa is an airy rocking song with heavy guitar riffs and Beach Boys-like background vocals. Pour Me is a nice old-fashioned country ballad with accompanying crying steel guitar. The title seems to have combined "Poor Me" and "Pour Me". So poor man at the booze ... The Gordon Lightfoot influence is great in mellow Planet Earth. The Last Man In Tujunga opens with Chuck Berry-like guitar riffs and continues as a barroom rocker in the style of NRBQ. Oddly enough (or not) I had to think about our own Cats through the acoustic guitar in the ballad Singing In The Wind. My Parka Saved Me can only be described as "hilarious". Spoken word by drummer Victoria Jacobs is interpreted by the band into velvety vocals. Versatile as the band is, they suddenly go on the hard ZZ Top tour with fiery guitar work in King Of The Rosemead Boogie. Great then is the transition to the bluegrass of Tearing Me In Two. Victoria Jacobs then sings the intimate ballad Spinning, in which she is supported by lush harmonies. The acoustic waltz The Isolation Mountains could have just come out of the sleeve of Willie Nelson. In closing you can hear another example of soft rocking Americana in Stop Me.

I See Hawks In L.A. proves with this album, that they are a top band, belonging to the top of traditional country rock.

(Dutch translation) The very first references when you listen to "Live and Never Learn" from alternative country band I See Hawks In L.A. are unmistakably Poco, The Byrds, Gram Parsons and the early work of The Eagles. The catchy, melodic ingredients, which make country rock music so popular, are richly present on the new release. Music that gives you a warm and melancholic feeling. Songs that enter your ear canal with great ease. With the difference that the atmosphere on "Live and Never Learn" sounds more casual, looser, bluesier and more inspired than before.

It has to be said. This skillful company is a bit less well-behaved, sweet and polished than on albums like Mystery Drug (2013), New Kind Of Lonely (2012) and Hallowed Ground (2008). A kind of spine on a branch that pricks you. With a backpack full of suffering on the backs of two band members, I See Hawks In L.A. comes out with the new work after five years of silence. The personal scars, but also the art of putting things into perspective, can be heard in the lyrics to "Live and Never Learn". With the ringing pedal steel (Dave Zirbel), the melodious sounds of the violin (Dave Markowitz), the sometimes gritty sounding guitars and the intense vocals, this record offers enough refinement to keep you interested for more than 55 minutes.

With guitarist Paul Lacques once again behind the board and Chuck Prophet-related vocals of singer Rob Waller, fourteen country rock-rock songs are expressed by the four in synch Americans. The icing on the cake is the intriguing "My Parka Saved Me" and the understated, acoustic splendor of the song "Spinning," where drummer Victoria Jacobs takes care of the vocals.

I SEE HAWKS IN L.A. : Live And Never Learn

Huitième album de ce groupe Californien fondé en 2001 dont j'ai déjà eu le plaisir d'en chroniquer plusieurs. Quoi de neuf ? ISHILA est aujourd'hui un quatuor avec Rob Waller (Chant lead, guitare rythmique), Paul Lacques (Guitare électrique, Chœurs), Paul Marshall (Basse, Chœurs) et Victoria Jacobs (Batterie, Chœurs), formule resserrée autour de Rob et Paul, les deux membres originaux et compositeurs principaux. Cela fait plaisir de les voir tracer leur route sans se répéter ostensiblement et attention à ne pas les considérer comme une équipe de vieux hippies ressassant le passé. Leurs textes montrent qu'ils sont toujours à l'écoute du monde, preuve en est ce premier titre Ballad For The Trees, dédié aux arbres, aux acacias et aux abeilles, manifeste prônant écologie et tolérance. La musique est toujours ce country-rock léger et efficace avec cette impression de simplicité, gage des chansons à propos desquelles on se demande pourquoi personne n'avait pensé à les écrire plus tôt. Singin In The Wind est dans l'esprit des premières chansons acoustiques des Eagles avec des belles harmonies vocales et un beau solo de guitare. Tonalité nettement plus électrique sur The Last Man In Tujunga relatant un incendie qui a laissé des traces en Californie, sur Stoned With Melissa (Every Day Of The Week) qui se passe de commentaires et sur King Of The Rosemead Boogie. N'oublions pas My Parka Saved Me qui, dans une atmosphère qu'on imagine proche de Fargo (les frères Cohen), raconte l'histoire vraie vécue par Victoria lors d'un accident de voiture près d'un lac gelé. L'album se termine logiquement par Stop Me, paisible et quatorzième chanson. Allez, soyons honnête, comment ne pas aimer un groupe qui a écrit un jour une chanson intitulée I Fell In Love With Greateful Dead ?

I See Hawks In L.A.: Live And Never Learn *******

Western Seeds Record Company (USA 2018)

Produced by Paul Lacques & Rob Waller

14 Tracks - 56:42 Min.

Es war das dramatische Datum Nine-Eleven 2001, als nicht nur die Türme des World Trade Center einstürzten sondern auch die Band I See Hawks In L.A. ihr erstes Album veröffentlichte - wobei aber das Ereignis in New York deutlich mehr Aufmerksamkeit auf sich zog. Weil wir hier aber eine Musik-Publikation sind, haben wir den musikalischen Output der Band seitdem aufmerksam verfolgt und können feststellen, dass ihr soeben erschienenes siebtes Album „Live And Never Learn“ ein weiterer Höhepunkt ihrer Karriere sein sollte. Das kalifornische Songwriter-Duo Paul Lacques und Rob Waller hat den Bassisten Paul Marshall und mittlerweile die Schlagzeugin Victoria Jacobs an ihrer Seite, und aus dieser Kooperation sind 14 ansehnliche neue Songs entstanden, die den Bogen von akustischem Folk-Rock a la Beyond Reach (die Nachlassverwalter der Ozark Mountain Daredevils!) bis zu südkalifornischem Rock im Stile von Warren Zevon spannen. Typisch für die Band sind ökologische Themen („Planet Earth“, „Ballad For The Trees“), die abgeklärte Auseinandersetzung mit Rauschmitteln („Poour Me“, „Stoned with Melissa“) und erfahrene Lebensweisheiten („Live And Never Learn“, „Spinning“). Die Brandkatastrophen in Südkalifornien finden ihren Niederschlag in dem Song „Last Man In Tujunga“, wo der Erzähler seine Ex am Telefon hat, während die Flammen schon fast an seinem Haus züngeln („I'm losing you like all the others / But that's no change in my luck“). Diese abgeklärte Mischung aus Ironie und Humanität macht die Hawks zu einer legendären Institution des Laurel Canyon Country-Rocks, die man gerne auch einmal live auf dem europäischen Kontinent hören würde.

(German translation) FIVE STARS ***** It was the dramatic date Nine-Eleven 2001, when not only the towers of the World Trade Center collapsed but the band I See Hawks L.A. released their first album - but the event in New York attracted significantly more attention. We've been watching the band's musical output ever since, and find that their newly released seventh album "Live And Never Learn" should be another highlight of their careers. California songwriting duo Paul Lacques and Rob Waller have bassist Paul Marshall and now drummer Victoria Jacobs at their side, and this collaboration has resulted in 14 big new songs that cover the arc of acoustic folk rock a la Beyond Reach (the estate administrator of Ozark Mountain Daredevils!) to Southern California Rock in the style of Warren Zevon. Typical for the band are ecological topics ("Planet Earth", "Ballad For The Trees"), the heightened discussion with intoxicants ("Poour Me", "Stoned with Melissa") and experienced life wisdom ("Live And Never Learn", "Spinning"). The fire catastrophes in Southern California are reflected in the song "Last Man In Tujunga", where the narrator has his ex on the phone, while the flames are almost at his house ("I'm losing you like all the others / But that's no change in my luck"). This subtle blend of irony and humanity makes the Hawks a legendary institution of Laurel Canyon country rock, which one would also like to hear live on the European continent.

(Dutch translation) As far as I'm concerned, their best piece of work, after California Country from 2006. The end result is a successful mix of alt. country, folk, rock and singer-songwriter songs - with a few nice surprises in between. The best I find is the spoken / sung interaction between drummer Victoria Jacobs and the other band members in My Parka Saved Me and the ballad Spinning written by Jacobs and wonderfully languid. Funny is also the sudden turn in the nostalgic Stoned With Melissa, which starts with country rock and ends in psychedelic music. And as in the case of The Last Man In Tujunga, where a fragment of Satisfaction from the Rolling Stones pops up for a brief moment, while that song is about those forest fires in your backyard. But as is known, seriousness and humor go hand in hand with ISHILA. Furthermore, enjoying the mellow country rocker Ballad For The Trees and the dreamy ballad Planet Earth, they express their worries about the environment and climate (it's so easy) - a recurring statement by the band. Nice swinging rock 'n' rolling boogie in The King Of Rosemead Boogie precedes the already mentioned Spinning, after which two wonderfully laid back porch ballads close this atmospheric, humorous and occasionally exciting album. Finally, the Waller baritone and the harmonies with Lacques and Marshall are still very beautiful after five years.
